A rhetorical analysis essay is an essay type that aims to study how the author persuaded, informed, or entertained the audience. This essay type analyzes the text in specific terms of rhetoric. Then break it down into several parts and examine them individually. The writer uses different techniques and methods to analyze text. Writing this essay requires a writer to explore the author's writing style and present information in a structured manner. To make this essay effective, develop an outline, and organize your raw data into logical information. This article is written to understand how a rhetorical analysis essay outline is created. Continue reading the blog and make your academic writing impressive. How to Write a Rhetorical Analysis Essay Outline? An outline of an essay is as important as a backbone to the human body. An outline provides a structure to the content making it readable and understandable for the readers. A rhetorical analysis essay uses the traditional essay outline to arrange its content. According to the standard outline, an essay is divided into three sections and five paragraphs. Introduction Body Paragraph 1 Body Paragraph 2 Body Paragraph 3 Conclusion Outlining an essay falls under the planning phase. Experts suggest before you jump on to the writing process, plan out your essay. Arrange all the gathered ideas and information into a logical order to make it easier for you to write the essay. Start your essay with all the pre-writing steps. Pre-writing includes choosing a topic, identifying the target audience, and gathering supporting information. After taking these steps, arrange everything according to the outline. Continue reading to learn how the information is organized in each section. Introduction An introduction is the first section of your rhetorical analysis essay. It introduces the selected piece of work and the essay topic for the audience. The rhetorical analysis essay's introductory paragraphs must be informative to clear the primary goal to the readers. The rhetorical analysis introduction has three basic components: Hook Background information Thesis statement. The opening statement of the introductory paragraph is called a hook. The purpose of drafting this sentence is to grab the reader's attention and motivate them to read the entire essay. The hook statement is designed, keeping in mind the chosen text and its theme. Once you have started your essay, provide the background information for your essay. The background information includes the author and his work's introduction and strategies to persuade the audience. After this, the writer provides his argument or claim on the original text. It is the essay's thesis statement, and the writer proves it by gathering evidence from the chosen content. It is the last part of the introduction that makes the audience clear what the paper is about. Body Paragraphs Your essay's body is the most significant section of the outline as it contains all the details on the topic. Therefore, an in-depth analysis of the text is presented in this part of the essay. Each point is discussed in a separate paragraph in the body section. A topic sentence is used for each paragraph. It focuses on the point that is to be addressed in that particular segment. The topic sentence makes it easier for the readers to identify which aspect is under discussion in that specific paragraph. Moreover, the body paragraphs shed light on the persuasive methods that the author used and their effectiveness. The writer uses quotes and analysis to support the main thesis statement. A trick to make your content stand out is to quote less and provide your analysis more. The readers are looking forward to seeing your viewpoint on the text. In a nutshell, the body of the rhetorical analysis essay should discuss the following things: Effectiveness of the strategies How well the strategy works in the example? Reasons behind choosing the specific approach Effects of the appeals on the audience Conclusion All the paragraphs in the body section lead the audience towards the conclusion of the essay. It is the last section where the discussion is concluded by summarizing the significant points. Moreover, the conclusion also highlights how the author influenced the audience's opinion or society in general. At the end of the concluding paragraph, restate the text's importance and its contribution to history. Rhetorical Analysis Essay Outline Template (PDF) (back to top) Types of Rhetorical Strategies Writing a rhetorical analysis essay is a bit different from other essay types. The reason being, a writer studies rhetorical or persuasive techniques used by the author to influence its audience. Generally, there are three rhetorical strategies through which the author attempts to persuade the audience. These include: Ethos - It establishes the writer's credibility in work. Ethos is then used to persuade the audience on a particle idea. The author built this credibility through his knowledge, expertise, and moral competence in the field. Pathos - It is a device that the author uses to appeal to the reader's emotions. The goal of this technique is to arouse feelings in the audience to persuade them. Logos - Unlike the other two devices, logos is a strategy that uses logic and reasons to persuade readers. The writer uses facts, critical thinking, statistics, and undeniable data to convince the audience of his viewpoint. For writing an effective rhetorical analysis essay, a writer identifies the author's strategies in the original text and evaluates them. Below is a prompt and example for a rhetorical essay, along with its score and what the writer did well and could have improved: The passage below is an excerpt from "On the Want of Money," an essay written by nineteenth-century author William Hazlitt. Read the passage carefully. Then write an essay in which you analyze the rhetorical strategies Hazlitt uses to develop his position about money. Student essay example: In his essay, Hazlitt develops his position on money through careful use of adjectives and verbs, hypothetical situations, and images. His examples serve to impress upon the reader the highly negative consequences of being in "want of money." Hazlitt's word choice in his opening phrase provides an example of his technique in the rest of the essay. It is not necessary to follow "literally" with "truly" yet his repetition of the same ideas emphasizes his point. In his next sentence, one that lasts forty-six lines, Hazlitt condignly repeats similar ideas, beating into his audience the necessity of having money in this world. The parallelism throughout that one long sentence, "it is not to be sent for to court, or asked out to dinner...it is not to have your own opinion consulted or sees rejected with contempt.," ties the many different situations Hazlitt gives together. What could have become a tedious spiel instead becomes a melodious recitation, each example reminding you of one before it, either because of the similarities in structure or content. Hazlitt addresses many different negative effects of not having money but manages to tie them together with his rhetorical strategies. The diction of the passage fully relays Hazlitt's position about money. In every example he gives a negative situation but in most emphasizes the terrible circumstance with strong negative adjectives or verbs. "Rejected," "contempt," "disparaged," "scrutinized," "irksome," "deprived," "assailed" "chagrin;" the endless repetition of such discouragement shows how empathetically Hazlitt believes money is a requisite for a happy life. Even the irony of the last sentences is negative, conveying the utter hopelessness of one without money. Through one may have none in life, pitiless men will proceed to mock one's circumstances, "at a considerable expense" after death! In having as the body of his essay one long sentence, Hazlitt creates a flow that speeds the passage along, hardly giving the reader time to absorb one idea before another is thrown at him. The unceasing flow is synonymous with Hazlitt's view of the life of a person without money: he will be "jostled" through life, unable to stop and appreciate the beauty around him or to take time for his own leisure. — The score on this essay was a 6 out of 6. This essay started out very strong as the student had a concrete thesis statement explaining the strategies that Hazlitt used to develop his position on money as well as Hazlitt's belief on the topic. In the thesis statement, the student points out that adjectives, verbs, hypothetical situations, and images help prove Hazlitt's point that wanting money can be problematic. Next, the student broke down their points into three main subsections related to their thesis. More specifically, the student first discusses word choice of repetition and parallelism. When the student discusses these strategies, they list evidence in the paragraph that can be found chronologically in Hazlitt's essay. The next paragraph is about diction, and the student used specific adjectives and verbs that support this idea. In the last paragraph, the student emphasized how the speed and flow of the essay helped describe Hazlitt's viewpoint on life. This last concluding sentence is particularly thoughtful, as it goes beyond the explicit points made in the essay and discusses the style and tone of the writing. It is important to remember that in some ways, the rhetorical essay is also an argumentative essay, as the student must prove how certain rhetorical strategies are used and their significance in the essay. The student even discussed the irony of the paragraph, which is not explicit in the passage. Overall, this student did an excellent job organizing and structuring the essay and did a nice job using evidence to prove their points. How Will AP Scores Affect College Chances?
